Synopsis:

When Dan Bramford (James Tupper) moves his family to the idyllic town of Stull to take up the mantle as the new pastor, he is greeted with open arms and welcomed with some all-American country charm by his new congregation. With its fair share of secrets, the seemingly sleepy Stull is actually built on a demonic gateway to hell. Every year a ritual human sacrifice must take place to protect the town from the plague of a dark supernatural force.

The Bramfords have a new home, new jobs and a new beginning in Stull; but the town has much more sinister plans in store for them.

We like it because:

We haven't come across a film in a long while that has SUCH a sense of impending doom. A feeling enhanced by the bone chilling musical score composed by Nicholas O'Toole and Slash, that even in the more light hearted moments it is difficult to shake.

Expect from this thrilling horror to be left feeling tense, filled with dread and amazingly for this genre your eyes may well up at times because of characters you will actually care about!
